

SKS Assault Rifles: A Menace to Law Enforcement

The SKS assault rifle, like the one reportedly used in the June 14, 2015 attack on a Congressional baseball game practice that left five wounded including House Majority Whip Steve Scalise and two Capitol Police officers, is the predecessor to the AK-47 assault rifle and uses the same 7.62 x 39mm ammunition as the AK-47. An SKS was also used in the November 2015 shooting at a Planned Parenthood clinic in Colorado where one police officer and two civilians were killed. The SKS is notoriously easy to convert to full-auto fire.¹

According to the Paladin Press book Full-Auto Conversion of the SKS Rifle, “In the first few years of U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War, the Viet Cong were mainly armed with the SKS rifle, and they used it to horrific effect. In fact, for sniping operations, the SKS, particularly when equipped with a scope, was much preferred to the AK-47 by Viet Cong and NVA soldiers...”

As seen in the table below, from 1998 through 2015, 23 law enforcement officers were killed in the line of duty with SKS assault rifles. In six of those incidents bullets fired from the SKS rifles penetrated the officers’ vests.²

In a 2002 report issued by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), the SKS was described at the time as “the rifle model most frequently encountered by law enforcement officers.”³

The ATF report noted that “these high capacity rifles pose an enhanced threat to law enforcement, in part because of their ability to expel projectiles at velocities that are capable of penetrating the type of soft body armor typically worn by the law enforcement officers.”
